Rain Drops

Dear Keith,

I heard someone say it again the other day, "It must be God's will, that this happened to me." I find that to be an odd phrase. First, because the vast majority of the time the person means something bad, something unexplainable has happened and therefore it must be God's fault. I have yet to hear a person win the lotto and say, "Yes, it must be God's will!"

Second, why would God create us with loving intention and then set about harming us? Sometimes I feel sorry for God, seems to get blamed for just about everything and seldom gets credit.

Unity teaches that the will of God is the nature of God, and that nature is absolute good, is perfection and wholeness. Yet, we are both human and divine. It is true that our human experience can be less than whole, or good. But blaming God negates the power inherent in the connection to Life.

So stop and ask yourself ~ what do you believe about the will of God? Is it the fall back for all bad things, or is it the call to see the good in back of all things?
